ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This book is born out of community, and I have been blessed to develop sustaining friendships along this academic journey. For their steadfast encouragement and compassionate care I thank Kezia Page, Renee Blake, Sharon Bryant, Cynthia Sedgwick, Patricia Saunders, Rhonda Frederick, Michelle Rowley, Jerry Philogene, Mabel Wilson, Mia Mask, Davarian Baldwin, Kitty Krupat, Pat McCrery, Sacha Page, George Henry and Valerie Bryant—many of whom stepped in to read chapters at critical junctures. Joe Keith, Nadine Ehlers, Faith Smith, and Tracy Robinson engaged (and argued with) me over fundamental conceptual ideas and then proceeded to read more of this manuscript—from its infancy to its completion—than any friendship deserves. Together, Allan Isaac and Harvey Neptune gave me their intellectual shoulders to stand on—Harvey persistently sent me back to question my conclusions, and Allan generously walked me through every stage of being a junior faculty member.

I have had the good fortune to be trained by scholars who insisted that we ask the tough questions—looking for the complexities and contradictions in our objects of study—rather than settle for tidy answers: Manthia Diawara, Andrew Ross, Tricia Rose, Lisa Duggan, Robin D. G. Kelley, Michael Dash, Kamau Brathwaite, Gerard Aching, Philip Brian Harper, Evelyn Hawthorne, Eleanor Traylor, Jennifer Jordan, and Jose Esteban Munoz. Key senior scholars encountered this project at its various stages and their meaningful engagement encouraged me to stay the course: Susan Strehle, Susan Stanford Friedman, Sandra Paquet, Nkiru Nzegwu, Laura Doyle, Silvio Torres Saillant, Cathie Brethschneider, Juan Flores, Belinda Edmondson, Irlene Francois, Marie-Hélène Laforest, William Spanos and David Scott. The two weeks in June of 2007 at the “Archaeologies of Black Memory” Symposium (sponsored by the Ford Foundation, Small Axe, and the Caribbean Literature Studies program at the University of Miami) provided a rigorous intellectual atmosphere for working through ideas about the archives and reconstructing Caribbean memories. I thank the librarians at the National Archives in Washington, DC, and the Institute of Jamaica for their generous assistance and Nathifa Morris, who ably translated these intimate documents. For his early editorial eye, I thank Ted Sammons. I am also appreciative for the feedback and mentorship received from members of the the Association for Caribbean Women Scholars and Writers.

The Binghamton University English Department proved a productive university home, and I thank my all colleagues for their support, but especially Dean Jean-Pierre Mileur for his active advocacy on my behalf. A State of New York United University Professions Dr. Nuala McGann Drescher Award and an English Department Research leave afforded me invaluable time to complete this manuscript. A special thanks to Michael Hames-Garcia, Ernesto Martinez, Lisa Yun, Marilyn Desmond, David Bartine, Ricardo Laremont and the junior faculty reading group who provided constructive intellectual comaderie: Joe Keith (again), Praseeda Gopinath, Monika Mehta, Jennifer Stoever-Ackerman, Scott Henkel, and Kelly Kinney. The dynamic student body still remains the capstone experience of teaching at Binghamton, and I thank my students in various classes over the years—Feminism and Globalization, Caribbean Literatures, Literatures of Hispaniola, and Postcolonial Narratives of Race and Desire—who have heard me work through these ideas, especially Melissa Madera, Jane Alberdeston, Raquel Goodison, Ameria Lennard, Adam Spanos, Aaronique Powell, Tom Jordan, Gail Upchurch, Henry Obispo, Cassandre Henriquez, and Adriana Nova, as well as Zhandarka Kurti for her additional bibliographic help.

I thank the anonymous readers whose close reading and challenging questions helped to strengthen my arguments. My supportive editorial team—Brigitte Shull, Lee Norton, Kristy Lilas, Colleen Cantrell, and Sarah Breeding—carefully shepherded this manuscript through its crucial final stages. Patricia Powell graciously discussed her novel with me over Sunday brunch in Harvard Square. I am deeply grateful to Roshini Kempadoo for generously allowing me to use her thought-provoking artwork. An earlier version of Chapter 3 appeared in Research in African Literatures, vol. 35, no. 2 (Summer 2004) and is used with permission of Indiana University Press.

In addition to my academic community, I am deeply appreciative of longstanding friendships from junior high school through the present, friendships that continue to keep me both grounded and whole: Kristyn Page, Donnetta Moss-Gardner, Keith Foster, Dion Anthony, Iretha Franklin, Fatima Legrand, Sheryl Byfield, Angela Pollard, and the Rodriguez' clan. Toni Irving has been my lifeline; her daily check-ins and words of assurance sustained me throughout. And finally, to my most intimate and sustaining community along this journey, I thank all my family members, but especially Donald, Leonie, David, Garneth, and Sophia for their unyielding faith in me; little Christina for infectious joy; and Philippe for the practice of unconditional love.
