This book would not have been written without the students of the Women, Crime and Justice seminar of the English Literature Department at Sheffield University. Their lively interest and willingness to explore the themes developed here have made them an incomparable sounding board. My colleagues have provided a constant stream of crime novels; some of these directly influenced these pages, some just kept me entertained, and I am deeply grateful for both. Sarah Daniels took considerable trouble to provide me with the manuscript of Blow Your House Down. I benefited from the insights at several conferences where I first tested out material in some of these chapters; special thanks to Nickianne Moody as the powerhouse behind the Association for Research into Popular Fictions, and to the organizers of the Women Writing Between the Wars Conference at St John's College, Oxford. It is rare to have an opportunity to work as playwright as well as scholar on the same text and I would like to thank all those concerned with Spoken in Darkness at the Liverpool Playhouse: Anne Imbrie and Joel Stillman of Spanky Pictures for their generosity in allowing us the rights, Mike Bonsall for his energy and enterprise in getting the project off the ground, and Dominic Druce and the cast and crew for bringing it to life.

This has at times been a very difficult book to write and my son has tolerated a house full of distressing material with his usual patience and charm.
