Acknowledgements

I welcome this opportunity to express my gratitude to the many people who helped me through the relatively lonely process of writing this book. At the University of Surrey - Roehampton, London, UK, Professor Pat Mahony and Professor Jen Coates, and at the Institute of Education, London, Professor Graham Welch, three dedicated scholars I was fortunate to have guiding and supporting my doctoral work. I am grateful to them for their wisdom and enthusiasm. I am also so very thankful to Dr Kelleen Toohey at Simon Fraser University, Canada, for her early belief in me and this project, and to RIIM for its initial funding.

I am deeply indebted to two colleagues who became my friends: first, to Cheryl Wall at Trinity Western University, Canada, for her skill and tenacious patience with the transcriptions and keyboarding needs; and second, to Dr Judith Baxter at the University of Reading, UK, for her interest, her intelligence, and her graciousness in reading various drafts of the book. I am grateful.

To Jill Lake and Paula Kennedy at Palgrave Macmillan for their interest in this book and their support regarding its completion. I also wish to thank my sister, Nikki Niles, for her clever cover design. Thank you! I am also very grateful to the students and staff at the University of Glamorgan, Wales, with whom I discussed many of the ideas developed in the book. I am also eternally grateful for the children and staff at the Punjabi school in Canada, who welcomed me warmly into their classrooms, their temples, their homes, and their lives. 'Shu-kri-ya!'

And, as ever and forever, I am so very grateful for the staggering support of Dr Marvin Lemke (Marv) and of our children, Clark and Jane. Their steady patience with me and their divine devotion to my ventures always make all the difference. To Clark and Jane, this is especially for you and your generation: Speak what you feel.
