

Cambridge Imperial and Post-Colonial Studies Series

General Editors: Megan Vaughan, Kings' College, Cambridge, and Richard Drayton, Corpus Christi College, Cambridge

This informative series covers the broad span of modern imperial history while also exploring the recent developments in former colonial states where residues of empire can still be found. The books provide in-depth examinations of empires as competing and complementary power structures, encouraging the reader to reconsider their understanding of international and world history during recent centuries.

Acknowledgements

This book exists because many people helped me. Firstly, I am deeply grateful to my supervisors Margit Szöllösi-Janze and Michael Bollig. Over the years, they have reliably supported my project by providing advice, critical comments, intellectual input, and guidance on practical concerns. Herzlichen Dank!

This book is based on my PhD thesis, which was accepted by the Philosophische Fakultät, University of Cologne, Germany, in November 2011. Many more institutions and individuals ensured that my research could proceed smoothly. Apart from funding my initial archival studies in the United Kingdom, the German Historical Institute London was a great academic environment to share first findings. The German Academic Exchange Service enabled me to proceed with the project in Africa. During the main phase of research and writing I was supported – financially, but also morally and intellectually – by the Cusanuswerk foundation.

In the various archives consulted, I was always lucky to meet committed members of staff. In the United Kingdom, I particularly wish to thank the archivists of the National Archives in Kew and Rhodes House Library, Oxford, where I spent many weeks of intensive research. Working in the National Archives of Zambia in Lusaka was an extraordinary pleasure. Giving me valuable advice on the collections, Marja Hinfelaar set me on the right track from the start. Patient members of staff let me go through copious files, and the sincere interest some took in my project was highly motivating. I also wish to thank the archivists at the United National Independence Party Archives in Lusaka and in the National Archives of Malawi in Zomba, where I was also a very demanding customer.

Some of the most rewarding experiences during these years were the interviews I conducted with former Kariba workers. I am deeply grateful to all those who shared their memories with me and made history come alive. In particular, I owe great debts of gratitude to †Mario Baldassarrini, who literally spent days answering my questions and putting me in touch with other informants. My oral history endeavours in Zambia might well have come to nothing if it had not been for Jairos Mazambani. Not only did he manage to find Zambian informants; he also accompanied me on my trips to the countryside and translated most of the interviews. Thank you so much!

Throughout the years, I have relied on many other scholars. In roughly chronological order, I wish to thank Jan-Bart Gewald and Robert Ross in Leiden for their enormous support in developing a convincing research design, putting me in contact with other researchers, and being there for me with whatever questions I had. Looking into related topics, JoAnn McGregor generously shared her thoughts and findings with me. Jan-Georg Deutsch invited me to spend a term at St Cross College in Oxford, allowing me to work in a new and stimulating environment and to receive fresh insights that helped my study progress.

During the time-consuming process of turning the doctoral thesis into a publishable book, I profited from the generosity of Andreas Eckert and Felicitas Hentschke at the International Research Center 'Work and Human Lifecycle in Global History' at Humboldt University in Berlin and the admirable patience of the student staff there.

On a more personal note, I would like to thank the Rev. Markus Höyng for encouraging me in my interest in Africa. Without the support of my family, this book would not exist. I am very grateful that my parents gave me the confidence and financial means to pursue such a long process of education. More than anyone else I have to thank my husband Daniel, who supported me with every aspect of this project – be it mundane issues of funding, travelling in Britain and in Zambia, or revising drafts. It was only his unfaltering preparedness to engage with my work that made this time a great experience for both of us.

With this book I complete what will certainly count among the best times of my life. I am immensely grateful for having had this opportunity – and somewhat embarrassed. There are certainly many Zambians who would love to conduct a similar study on this part of their country's history, but will never get the chance to do so. Of course, anyone can write anyone's history, but I hope that the day will come when there are as many Zambians enjoying the opportunity to research German history as there are Germans investigating Zambia's past.
